Dear Ida,

Our brains are masters of generalities. One of the marvels of being a program leader for Landmark is standing for each and every participant in our programs getting value. That demands operating beyond the way our brains normally work. Each and every requires looking, connecting, measuring, dialoguing, and having everyone matter.

A powerful way to create a revolution in the way the world is and is not – have each and every person matter, and stand for each and every person getting value around you. Try it in your families, in your department, or your block. You will transform and you will cause transformation with that stand.

I have discovered that standing for each and every is a radical departure from the ordinary, and a reliable access to both ongoingly transforming myself and to contributing transformation to others. Perhaps human leadership truly arises from one's stand for each and every.
